I

I (əi), the ninth letter and third vowel of the Roman alphabet, going back through the Greek Iota to the Semitic Yod. The Semitic letter represents a consonant (= English y in yellow, yoke, etc.); by the Greeks, who had no y consonant, it was adopted as the symbol of the i vowel. In the Latin alphabet, on the other hand, it was used with both values, viz. that of i vowel (long and short), and y consonant, as in ibīdem, ibis; iacui, Iouis. When the consonant sound (y) passed in Romanic into the 'soft g' sound (dʒ), it continued to be symbolized by I until the early part of the 17th century, when it came to be denoted by J j, a differentiated form of I i, which was then confined to the vowel-sounds.

The original value of the Græco-Roman I vowel when long was that of the 'high-front-narrow' vowel of Bell's scale, as in French machine, etc. In Teutonic, the short i has prob. always been the corresponding 'wide' vowel (i), as in Eng. finny, missing. Long i, on the other hand, has changed into a diphthong with i as its second element. The English diphthong is here symbolized by (əi), the first element being taken as the 'mid-mixed-wide' vowel of Bell's scale, the general 'obscure vowel' of English; but it varies locally. Cf. OE., OHG., OLG. mīn with Eng. mine, Ger. mein, Du. mijn.

For other values of the letter i see the key to the pronunciation.

The dot surmounting the minuscule or 'small letter' i is derived from a diacritic mark, like an acute accent, used in Latin MSS. to indicate the i in positions in which it might have been mistaken for part of another letter. The same cause led finally to the growth in English of a kind of scribal canon that i must not be used as a final letter, but must in this position be changed to y; though in inflected forms, where the i was not final, it was retained; hence city, cities; holy, holier, holiest, etc.

I. The letter and its name. (Pl. Is, I's, is, i's.) I per se, or I per se I, the letter I forming a syllable by itself, esp. the pronoun I. Also fig. esp. in To dot the i's, etc.; see DOT v.[1]

II. 1. Used to denote serial order; marking, e.g., the ninth sheet of a book, etc. 2. In Logic, a particular affirmative. 3. The Roman numeral symbol for ONE. (This was not originally the letter, but a single line denoting unity.) 4. Math. In Higher Algebra, i or ι often stands for $\sqrt{-1}$. In Quaternions, i, j, k, are symbols of vectors.

Ic, obs. f. I pron.

-ic (formerly -ick, -ik(e, -ique) suffix, primarily forming adjs., many of which are used as sbs. having also the form -ics; see 2.

1. In adjs., immediately repr. F. -ique, ad. L. -ic-us, occurring in words of L. formation, as civicus, classicus, or in L. words adopted from Gr., as comicus κωμικός. This suffix in Gr., formed adjs. with the sense 'after the manner of', 'of the nature of', 'pertaining to', 'of'. In L. it was used chiefly in the compound suffix -aticus (-ATIC, -AGE), and in wds. formed from Gr., or on Gr. types. b. In Chem., the suffix is used to form the names of oxygen acids and other compounds having a higher degree of oxidation than those whose names end in -ous; e.g. chloric acid HO_3Cl, chlorous acid HO_2Cl.

2. Already in Gr., adjs. in -ικός were used absol. as sbs., e.g. in sing. masc., as Στωικός (man) of the porch, Stoic, hence in L. Stoicus; also, in sing. fem., in names of arts (sc. τέχνη), or systems of thought, knowledge, or action (sc. θεωρία, φιλοσοφία), e.g. ἡ μουσική music, ἡ ἠθική ethics, etc.; and in neut. pl., as τὰ οἰκονομικά things pertaining to domestic economy, a treatise on this, economics.

In English, words of this class in use bef. 1500 had the singular form, as arsmetike, magike, logike (-ique), etc.; this form is retained in arithmetic, logic, magic, music, rhetoric. Subseq., forms in -ics (-iques) occur as names of treatises, e.g. etiques = τὰ ἠθικά; and towards 1600 this form is applied to the subject-matter of such treatises, in mathematics, economics, etc. From 1600 onward this has been the accepted form with names of sciences, as acoustics, etc., or matters of practice, as æsthetics, politics, tactics, etc. The names of sciences, even though ending in -ics, are construed as singular; while names of practical matters, as gymnastics, politics, tactics, remain plural, in construction as well as in form.

3. Besides the preceding, there are many other sbs. formed directly from adjs. in -ic taken absol., as emetic, cosmetic (pl. emetics, etc.); epic, lyric, Anacreontics, iambics; domestic, rustic, classic, mechanic, lunatic.

-ical, a compound suffix, f. -IC + -AL, forming an adj. from a sb. in -ic, as music, musical, or a secondary adj., as comic, comical. Many adjs. have a form both in -ic and -ical, that in -ical being usually the earlier and the more commonly used. Often also the form in -ic is restricted to the sense 'of' or 'of the nature of' the subject in question, while that in -ical has wider or more transferred senses.

-ically, advb. ending, f. -ICAL + -LY 2, forming advs. from adjs. in -ical, which are used also as the advs. from the corresponding adjs. in -IC. Thus poetic, poetical, adv. poetically.

Icarian (əikē·ə·riăn), a. 1595. [f. L. Icarius = Gr. Ἰκάριος, f. Icarus, Ἴκαρος the son of Daedalus, in Gr. Myth.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of Icarus, who, in escaping from Crete, flew so high that the sun melted the wax with which his wings were fastened on, so that he fell into the sea; hence, applied to ambitious acts which end in ruin.
